Abstract

Identifies and highlights the factors that determine the demand for complex decisions of access to health care. Based on primary data of sample the evidence is analyzed to the extent to which each of these facts acts as a barrier to demand. Attempt is also to list range of strategies that have been used to mitigate the identified barriers. The study is therefore indicative of the impact and complexity of the effects. The evidence is then extrapolated as to whether they are the real reasons to low performance on the health indicators and also discuss the implications for future policy making to ensure equity in access to health care services.
